THE SWEDISH SONDERWEG IN QUESTION: DEMOCRATIZATION AND INEQUALITY IN COMPARATIVE PERSPECTIVE, c.1750–1920*

I

A SWEDISH SONDERWEG?

In history as well as in the social sciences, it is tempting to interpret modern-era outcomes, often on the national level, in the spheres of politics and economics as the result of long-term trajectories. We might call to mind Macfarlane’s thesis of a continuity of individualism in English society since the thirteenth century, or the analysis of German history that claims that Germany fell prey to Fascism because of its lack of a bourgeois revolution, which left the country off the ‘normal’ path of liberal modernization and instead put it on a Sonderweg dominated by conservative nobles and militaries.1

Sweden in the twentieth century became known for its ‘middle way’ between capitalism and socialism, as a country with a high degree of economic equality, an encompassing welfare state, and an exceptionally strong social democracy. It has become commonplace to see Sweden’s twentieth-century egalitarianism as the outcome of a long historical trajectory, a Swedish Sonderweg. In different formulations, the Swedish Sonderweg thesis stresses the heritage of a free and politically active farming class, economic egalitarianism, and a responsive state. Within Sweden, this idea has reached ‘the status of a national myth’, as it has been embraced not only by professional historians but also by political parties and a wider interested community. The latest example is a successful and influential book of popular history, which presents equality as the ‘fate’ of the Swedish people. In its various guises, the Swedish Sonderweg analysis has also gained currency in the international research literature, and is standard in textbooks.

However, the factual basis of the Swedish Sonderweg interpretation is weak. This article discusses Swedish political and social development from the mid eighteenth century to the 1920s, the period when Sweden modernizes and transforms from an agrarian society undoubtedly ruled by the monarchy and nobility, to an industrial economy with political democracy. It is shown that the Sonderweg thesis misconstrues what kind of route Sweden took to modernity. In fact, Sweden c.1850–1920 was severely unequal. In 1900, it was one of the western European countries with the most restricted suffrage, and wealth was more unequally distributed than in the famously inegalitarian United States. Thus, there is no unbroken continuity of egalitarianism in Swedish history, and any potential pre-modern relative equality cannot explain twentieth-century social democratic equality.

The discontinuity is illustrated in Figure 1. It might be expected that the Scandinavian countries, which were distinguished in the late twentieth century by redistributive social democratic welfare states,4 would be marked by an inheritance of relative equality. However, recent studies of Sweden since 1903, Denmark since 1870 and Norway since 1875 contradict this expectation. According to Swedish researchers: ‘Sweden was not more equal than other Western countries at the beginning of the twentieth century’.5

Figure 1 shows that while the three Scandinavian countries were the most equal in 1970–2010, this is not at all the case in the early twentieth century, when Swedish and Norwegian income inequality was higher than that in allegedly reactionary Germany, and on a par with that in France, the United Kingdom and the United States. There is a puzzle here, a turnaround to explain.6

II

THE SWEDISH SONDERWEG VIEW

Various analyses are gathered under the label ‘the Swedish Sonderweg view’, which in different ways point to a unique Swedish (or broadly Scandinavian) historical legacy of egalitarianism. Three variations will be discussed: a class-based analysis following Barrington Moore; a more socioculturally grounded analysis; and an analysis that focuses on political culture. Beyond these three versions, it is a common assumption in the social sciences and history to assume that Sweden/Scandinavia in the early modern period had ‘a more equal social structure than the rest of Europe’,7 and that this has explanatory power for the later developments of the country/region. Thus, the implications of the argument in this article are not necessarily limited to the precise researchers discussed in this section.

The Barrington Moore model

In historical sociologist Barrington Moore’s model of ‘routes to the modern world’, whether a country ends up on a bourgeois-democratic, authoritarian–fascist, or communist route, depends on the country’s constellation of class forces during modernization. According to Moore, British and French modernization was led by bourgeois liberals, while in Prussia, Germany the dominance of the old landowning nobility (the Junkers) led to an authoritarian route, and in Russia and China

6 Compare Eley’s argument against the German Sonderweg thesis, on the need to redirect focus from the long run to more short-term causes of the fascist disaster. the absence of capitalist modernization in agriculture led to a peasant revolt-cum-communist revolution.

In the 1970s, two Anglophone researchers tested Moore’s model on the Swedish case. Castles found that the bourgeoisie was comparatively weak in Sweden, and in fact after 1809 became a subservient ally to the nobility, in precisely the kind of coalition (‘iron and rye’) that according to Moore’s model would lead to authoritarianism. Castles pointed to the existence of a strong peasant-farmer class as the factor that saved Sweden from the authoritarian route: ‘In a sense, the farmers held the line until industrialism produced a liberal middle class capable of asserting its own rights’. Timothy Tilton found less of an authoritarian threat in Swedish history than Castles did, but just like Castles, he emphasized the role of the peasant farmers. In Tilton’s analysis, Sweden was never fully feudal, and with reference to an English-language history of Sweden from 1931, he claimed that the nobility held only 10 per cent of the land, which is both quite unhistorical — of course this share varied over time — and quite misleading. In fact, the nobility, which was around 0.5 per cent of the population, held about 20–25 per cent of arable land from the late medieval period to 1600, 65 per cent in 1658, and one-third in 1700. Similarly to Castles, Tilton claimed that the peasantry was extraordinarily important in Sweden, and politically adopted the liberal role played by the bourgeoisie in Moore’s model: ‘The size and strength of the independent Swedish peasantry can hardly be overemphasized, for in Sweden the peasants often played the role that the bourgeoisie played elsewhere as an agency for preserving the balance between the monarchy and the nobility’. The analysis in which a strong independent peasantry plays the role of a guarantee of democracy in the absence of a strong urban bourgeoisie, is represented in a different theoretical context also by, for example, Anderson.\(^{11}\)

A peasant-oriented approach

A long historical trajectory of egalitarianism is also claimed in a less materialist, more cultural–historical tradition of research. In this interpretation, the Scandinavian countries took a peasant-dominated route to modernity, which was marked by an egalitarian society and an egalitarian culture. Sørensen and Stråth claim that there was a specific ‘Nordic Enlightenment’, which ‘had the peasant as its foremost symbol . . . as the mythical incarnation of education (bildning/dannelse), freedom, and equality’. In Sweden, there had been peasant-farmer representation in parliament since the fifteenth century, and this is symbolic of a ‘Nordic Sonderweg’ where the social democracy of the twentieth century is seen as a continuation of a Lutheran peasant-farmer culture where social liberalism and social democracy coalesce.\(^{12}\) Unlike in continental Europe where democratization was extending noble rights to everyone, in Scandinavia, ‘the construction of modern democracy can be seen as a process of generalizing the political culture of the local peasant assembly’.\(^{13}\) According to Sørensen and Stråth and their followers, the lack of feudalism and the political representation for farmers meant that they played a larger role in the Nordic countries than in other European societies, and early modern and nineteenth-century farmer populism paved the way for twentieth-century social democracy.

The political culture variant of the Sonderweg thesis

The historian Eva Österberg has launched an interpretation where the ‘Swedish model’ of consensus-seeking, compromise-friendly, rationalist policy making, most often associated with the period following the Social Democratic ascension to government after 1932, actually starts in the sixteenth century. Österberg asserts that the relative dearth of peasant uprisings after the 1530s and farmers’ political representation in parliament demonstrates that there was a degree of consensus between the rulers and the ruled. The extent of peasant-farmer involvement in local politics and as lay representatives in local courts is stressed by Österberg as these involvements meant regular contact between the state and the ruled. Two keywords in her argument are ‘interaction’ and ‘negotiation’, and she claims that the frequent interactions between rulers and the ruled created a consensus-oriented political culture in Sweden, where to an unusual degree rulers derived their legitimacy from the negotiations with their subjects.14

It is no simple matter to determine the degree to which Österberg’s description of Swedish political culture is correct.
Her interpretation has attracted criticism for downplaying power inequalities between the rulers and the ruled, and critics have claimed that the lack of peasant uprisings after the 1530s depended more on the considerable repressive capacities of the standing armies developed during this period, than on any rulers and subjects in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, but also show the limitations of the argument by showing the lack of political opportunities for propertyless groups, and the recurring conflicts between the proletarians and the consensus between rulers and the ruled.\textsuperscript{15} These are good points, but from the point of view of this article, more importantly Österberg’s analysis (1) is silent about the existence of proletarian and semi-proletarian groups who were excluded from the political arenas she highlights, and (2) sees a continuity from the early modern period to the twentieth century, which this article questions in terms of political and economic inequality.

III

THE SWEDISH ANCIEN RÉGIME, c.1750–1850

The Swedish Sonderweg view in all its guises stresses the role of the free farmers. And it is true that while Prussia abolished serfdom in 1810 and Russia in 1861, this had happened long since in Sweden, where serfdom gradually disappeared between 1000 and 1300 CE.\textsuperscript{16} However, this does not mean that the Swedish economy and polity were egalitarian and inclusive. I raise here two objections: (1) that while the peasant farmers were indeed acknowledged as political actors, they were very much a subordinate actor in a game dominated by the elite; (2) the peasant-centred story misses the fact that the peasants were not the lowest strata of society. The inclusion of this lower strata of labourers, and a correct appreciation of the role of the nobility, alters the tenor of the account of Swedish modernization.

Farmers and other people

In 1750, 80 per cent of the rural, commoner, heads of household were peasant farmers. However, this figure includes the tenants of the nobility, so we must not assume that all of them owned land. It was only the freeholders and the tenants on crown land who were represented in parliament; the nobility’s tenants had no voting rights. From 1750 to 1850 landless rural groups grew, and in 1850 the share of heads of household who were farmers had decreased from 80 to 50 per cent.\textsuperscript{17} The socially significant parts of the rural population who were proletarian or semiproletarian are to a large degree overlooked by the Sonderweg view, where all emphasis is on the strength of the independent peasantry.

During her trip to Sweden in 1796, the English author Mary Wollstonecraft was shocked at how servants were treated. She wrote:

In fact, the situation of the servants in every respect, particularly that of the women, shows how far the Swedes are from having a just conception of rational equality. They are not termed slaves; yet a man may strike a man with impunity because he pays him wages, though these wages are so low that necessity must teach them to pilfer, whilst servility renders them false and boorish.

Traditionally the image has been that to be a servant in agrarian Sweden was a life-cycle occupation; that is, the children of farmers were servants in their youth, until they became old enough to inherit the farm. Then, at around the age of 30, they transitioned from being a servant to being a self-owning farmer; thus, to be a servant would be seen as a life-cycle trait rather than a class position. However, as the population grew after 1750 and a smaller share of the new generations could inherit or afford to buy a farm, the servant occupation became less of a life-cycle phenomenon and an ever-increasing number of people became life-long wage labourers.

Until 1885, the Swedish labour market was regulated under a regime which stipulated that if a person could not live off their property, and did not have employment, they could be sentenced to forced labour. Sweden was the last among the Nordic countries to abolish this regulation, after Denmark and Norway in the 1850s, and Finland in 1863. That this ‘essentially feudal words, lodgers, servants and other landless workers who lived in the household of a farmer are not counted. For this reason, the degree of proletarianization is much underestimated, which has been highlighted by recent local studies. Tommy coercive measure’ was in place until 1885 tells us something important about the nature of Swedish society during this period. In 1885, the old labour regime was replaced by regulation of ‘drifters’ and ‘vagrants’, which still allowed for the punishment of, for example, strikers who were temporarily without employment.

Farmers and politics, c.1750–1850

As discussed in section II, Castles, Tilton, Stråth, Österberg and others have all presented the peasant farmers and their political representation as the guarantor of a democratic and egalitarian route to modernity in Sweden. For the farmers to play this function, they must have (1) stood for an inclusive politics, and (2) exerted influence. Based on the Swedish-language political history literature, I now discuss these two points, beginning with the second.

The Swedish-language political history literature portrays the farmers very much as a subordinate partner. There was no peasant farmer in government until 1906, when the progressive liberal Petersson i Påboda became the minister for education. Governments were dominated by estate-owners, militaries and bureaucrats, with added capitalists and merchants after 1850. Among the four estates of the four-estate diet, which was in place until 1865, the farmers’ estate was the only one that never got the right to elect its own speaker; this was the king’s right. Furthermore, it was the one estate that was not represented on the Privy Council, the most important parliamentary committee. Among the four estates, the nobility and the clergy played a conservative role. The farmers were more oppositional. Since decisions were made by a majority of the estates, the burghers had an important role in the middle.

So, the peasant-farmer politicians were subordinate. We can still ask whether they ideologically played the role of a democratic-liberal avant-garde? Many Swedish political historians, incognizant of the great role played by the farmers in the international comparative literature, have on the contrary portrayed the peasant-farmer politicians as narrow-minded, conservative, reactive, loyal to the king, and focused on very specific issues such as the right to home production of liquor. This image is so common that one of the more recent studies of farmer politicians asks in the title: ‘Primitive farmers?’ Of course, there are also a few historians who have viewed peasant farmers and their political representatives as proactive agents in Swedish nineteenth-century politics. In his dissertation about the peasant estate in parliament 1760–72, Alexandersson revises the common image of the peasant parliamentarians as unengaged and lazy. Likewise, Hultqvist points out that since the major share of public expenditure was funded by land taxes, and noble land was exempt from tax, in reality the peasant farmers were the most heavily taxed group, and that the bureaucracy was privileged and dominated by nobles. For these reasons, as Christensen indicates, the intense criticism from peasant politicians against state bureaucracy and public spending c.1850–80 must not necessarily be seen as the result of short-sighted penny pinching, but rather can be viewed as founded in real inequalities and injustice. In the mid nineteenth century, the peasant politicians indeed appeared as conservative in issues of finance and banking, but not as void of ideology nor as one-sided opponents of any public investments.

In conclusion, the farmer politicians at least to some degree were a democratic voice. Christensen in the best study of this issue shows that in the nineteenth century before the 1865 reform, the ancien régime was defended by a conservative group of bureaucrats and estate owners, while the liberal-democratic opposition was led by anti-bureaucratic liberal newspapermen, in an interesting alliance with the progressive wing of the farmers in parliament. But Christensen also shows how the peasant farmers focused to a large degree on defending the interests of their own class vis-à-vis their exploitation by estate owners and the state, and to a much lesser degree on the interests of the propertyless groups, in, for example, access to schooling.25

The nobility
A key part of Swedish ‘Whig history’ is to write off the nobility as unimportant to general social development after c.1800.26 Sten Carlsson’s analysis of the alleged downfall of the Swedish nobility has been very influential. Carlsson pointed especially to two reforms as indicative: (1) the opening up of higher positions in public service for commoners through a reform in 1789; (2) the introduction of laws in 1789 and 1809 allowing commoners to buy tax-exempt land that until then had been reserved for nobles. On both points, Carlsson’s interpretation — coloured as it was by the Swedish belief in an egalitarian exceptionalism — has been shown to be flawed. Norrby, in his revisionist dissertation on the Swedish nobility in the nineteenth century, pointed out that the nobility continued to dominate the higher echelons of the bureaucracy and military even after the 1789 reform, by virtue of their superior education and social and cultural capital. On land-owning, Winberg showed that contrary to Carlsson’s assumptions, the nobility in parliament was by no means united against the 1809 reform.27 Many of them realized that the creation of a freer, more capitalist market for tax-exempt land in no way forced them to sell, and would indeed increase the price of this land, benefitting them as current holders and aiding them in consolidating their investments if they so wished. Further research confirms that nobles’ ownership of other types of land indeed increased after 1809. More recent research by Clark shows that still today, Swedish nobles dominate the high-prestige professions such as law and medicine, and are significantly wealthier than non-nobles. The idea that the nobility lost out during an allegedly ‘bourgeois’ nineteenth century once fitted the Whig history of Marxists and liberals, but does not square with the facts of Swedish history.28

IV

THE PERSISTENCE OF THE OLD REGIME, 1850–1920

Economic inequality

As shown in section I, in the early twentieth century, Sweden was no more egalitarian in terms of income distribution than Germany, the United States and other capitalist economies. To go further back in time, we need to turn to wealth inequality. In pre-industrial society with a large degree of subsistence economy, this is a better measure of economic inequality than the distribution of incomes. Swedish wealth distribution since 1750 is shown in Figure 2, building on new research, and in comparison with the three other countries for which long-run data are available: Britain, France and the United States.

Wealth inequality grew gradually in Sweden from 1750 to 1900, in several different ways. One powerful mechanism was the growth of the rural proletariat, as discussed in section II: the growth of poor groups with little or no wealth implied a bottom-led growth of inequality. Yet at the same time, inequality also grew from the top (or almost-top) as the non-noble but wealthy class of merchants and capitalists grew in numbers as well as increased their wealth.29 The end product is wealth distribution in 1850 and 1900 that is not especially equal in a comparative perspective. In 1850, the 10 per cent wealthiest people held 81 per cent of the private wealth in Sweden, compared with 82 per cent in France, 84 per cent in the United Kingdom, and 70 per cent in the United States (in 1870). In other words, Swedish wealth distribution was about as unequal as the French and British, and significantly more unequal than American distribution. In 1910, the picture is essentially the same, with the top decile’s share at 88 per cent in Sweden, 89 per cent in France, 92 per cent in Britain, and 81 per cent in the United States.

Swedish plutocracy in a European perspective

Sweden in the 1850–1920 period was not only highly unequal economically, but also politically. A key indicator of how inclusive society was, is the share of the population who were enfranchised. Table 1 shows this for elections to the second chamber of parliament or equivalent in the 1890s, in sixteen European countries.

Sweden in the 1890s had a strikingly low share of enfranchised adult citizens. Among the sixteen European countries compared in Table 1, with 24 per cent of adult men Sweden has the lowest share enfranchised after Hungary: much lower than relatively democratic Norway (77 per cent), France (85 per cent), and even Germany (82 per cent). Another revealing fact is the low degree of electoral participation among the few who enjoyed the right to vote: in 1896 less than half of those lucky few cast a ballot. In 1872 the share had been only a fifth; apathy marked Swedish politics during these decades.30 Furthermore, it was the first chamber that played the role as a conservative guarantee in the Swedish system. This was extremely exclusive: in 1872, only 6,000 men were eligible to be elected to the chamber, and in 1885 it was 12,000. The electorate to the first chamber was only about one-tenth the size of that for the second chamber.31

It is striking how large the differences in political participation were between Sweden and its neighbours, Denmark and Norway. Swedish national politics was governed by the 1866 two-chamber order, which replaced the four-estates parliament of medieval tradition. In Denmark, the 1849 constitution made more of a break with the old order, establishing royal absolutism;32 likewise, the Norwegian 1814 constitution was more radical.

than the Swedish constitution of 1866. It seems that the greater degree of inclusiveness in Sweden at the beginning of the nineteenth century allowed the country to ‘lag behind’ in democratic reforms; the 1866 reform is known in the Swedish literature as the ‘society-preserving reform’ (samhällsbevarande reformen) in just its conservatism and inhibiting effect on further reform, showing the great tactical acumen of the elite of estate owners, nobles and capitalists.33

The Swedish election system was even more unequal on the local level. In the municipalities, established in 1862, a minimum level of income or wealth was necessary for the right to vote, and among those with the right to vote, the number of votes was distributed according to their income and/or wealth. In urban municipalities, an individual (which could also be a company) could control up to one hundred votes or 2 per cent of the total votes (5 per cent before 1869); in rural municipalities, there was no such limit. This infamously led to several municipalities being ruled by a ‘dictator’ in the sense that one single individual controlled more than half of the votes. In 1871 this was the case in 54 municipalities, while in 414 localities, more than a quarter of the votes were controlled by a single individual. In the 1880s, the cousin of the prime minister Count Arvid Posse was one of the local ‘dictators’, due to the value of his family estate. As Mellquist put it, all countries in Europe restricted the franchise of the poor, but none were as extreme as the Swedish system.

Class character of the state
From the Swedish Sonderweg story, we would expect Sweden to have had a ‘prescient’ welfare state already in the late 1800s or early 1900s. This was not the case. As Lindert points out, there was nothing special about the amounts, as a share of GDP, of the Swedish state’s welfare expenditure (poor relief, health, etc.) between 1880 and 1920. Indeed, in 1913 the share of state expenditure going to the military was especially high in Sweden, which is especially remarkable given that the country had not been at war since 1814. Forty-two per cent of state spending went to the military, which may be compared with 31 per cent in Norway, 16 in Denmark, 27 in the Netherlands and 25

In contrast to the very stark political inequality of the late nineteenth century discussed here, Erik Örjan Emilsson, Sweden and the European Miracles: Conquest, Growth and Voice (Gothenburg, 1996), 16, points out that in 1809, 13 per cent of the adult population could vote to parliament, while the corresponding figure for the USA in 1820 was less than 8 and for Britain before 1831 less than 4. In other words, Sweden’s position in the franchise table might have drastically changed during the nineteenth century. This could be discussed together with the fact, as shown in Figure 2, that wealth inequality increased dramatically from 1800 to 1900.

pattern. The neighbouring countries had a markedly broader social recruitment to higher office. Norway drew 12 out of 17 prime ministers between 1876 and 1921 from the free professions (lawyers, professors, teachers, an engineer) and one was even a farmer. Among Denmark’s twenty-one prime ministers from 1855 to 1920, only four were noble. These four and three others were estate owners, while eight were lawyers, one was a school teacher, three were newspaper men.\(^{39}\) The social background of the prime ministers was also more exclusive in Sweden. Until Staaff in 1905 all Swedish prime ministers had fathers who were high-rank militaries, factory owners, estate owners, and in one case a bishop; there was nothing like the farmer, carpenter, mason or shoemaker fathers of Danish and Norwegian prime ministers. The recruitment to the highest political office was more exclusive and more ‘old regime’ in Sweden.

In the two-chamber parliament after 1866, farmers made up a large share of the second chamber. While Sweden did not have fully fledged political parties during this period (the protectionism issue in 1888 is seen as fundamental to the party system), most of the second chamber MPs were organized either in the moderately liberal Ministerial party, or in the Country party (Lantmannapartiet). The Country party organized as a counterweight to the Ministerial party, at the initiative of the estate owner Count Arvid Posse, who together with the gentry estate owner Emil Key and the farmer Carl Ifvarsson made up the party leadership. Posse’s biographer entertains the idea that the Count, who was a well-known conservative and opponent of the 1865–66 representation reform, organized the party to lead the farmers into a harmless agrarian identity politics, instead of pursuing more radical policies.\(^{40}\) That farmers organized into a party under the leadership of estate owners is quite unlike the farmers’ parties in Denmark and Norway, and is in stark contrast to Rueschemeyer et al.’s argument, building on

Lipset and Rokkan, that Sweden belonged to a group of countries where smallholding farmers organized themselves, in contrast to, for example, Prussia where they were led by agrarian elites. Again, Sweden is more Prussian than is assumed in the literature.41

The two most important issues for the farmers and the Country party were the lowering of taxes and the farmers’ costs for supplying soldiers to the army; both taxation and the cost of soldiers lay disproportionately on the farming class. Under the tutelage of Posse and Key, the bulk of the farmers grew more conservative compared with the role they had played up to the 1865–66 representation reform. After the reform, the pro-democratic impulses of the farmers faded out over the 1870s and 1880s, and the first powerful democratization movement came only in the 1890s with the socialist and liberal suffrage movement, which had very little to do with the farmers. The initiative had by now moved away from the farmers, who instead aligned with the estate owners in a conservative alliance. While the farmers’ parties in Denmark and Norway became the liberal parties, in Sweden, the Country party in 1904 merged with other parties into the Conservative party. That the Swedish agrarian party pre-1904 was less of a democratic force than one might expect is of course in itself related to the limited suffrage discussed in relation to Table 1 above; the farmers in parliament belonged to the elite within their class.

Lipset and Rokkan, that Sweden belonged to a group of countries where smallholding farmers organized themselves, in contrast to, for example, Prussia where they were led by agrarian elites. Again, Sweden is more Prussian than is assumed in the literature.41

Was there a continuity between farmers and the labour movement? Swedish Sonderweg analyses tend to see a continuity between farmer politics and liberal democracy and the social democratic welfare state. Did, then, the political representation of the farmers mean that the state was lenient towards the nascent labour movement? This is questionable. The labour regime was repressive, as discussed in section III, and there is no evidence that the political presence of farmers increased understanding 45 As is shown in new empirical research by myself and Mats Olsson. We show that the wealth of farmer parliamentarians was about four times larger than that of average farmers, and in the 1890s even nine to ten times larger. Bengtsson and Olsson, ‘Peasant Aristocrats? Inequality between Peasant Parliamentarians and their Voters in Sweden, 1769–1895’, Lund Papers in Economic History, no. 175 (Lund, 2018).

towards the labour movement, unlike in Finland, where such an argument has been made.\textsuperscript{46} The Swedish state certainly used less violence against the union movement than did its US counterpart\textsuperscript{47}, but it was not particularly amicable towards it either, as witnessed, for example, by the use of vagrancy laws to sentence the 1879 Sundsvall strikers to forced labour, or the 1906 Mackmyra conflict where the former prime minister Christian Lundberg, who was the CEO of the afflicted company, fired all workers who had joined a union and, in the middle of the winter, evicted them and their families from their company housing. The state also took action against the unions, for example with the 1899 law (Åkarpslagen), which made it illegal to try to stop strike-breakers; in fact, the law even made it illegal for striking workers to speak to the strike-breakers.\textsuperscript{48} Again Sweden, compared with Finland, appears as the less ‘Nordic’ country: less egalitarian, more conflict-ridden.

Economic inequality drastically worsened during the nineteenth century (see Figure 2), and it should be noted that this increase coincided with a major process that had equalizing implications: the emigration, between 1870 and 1910, of about one million Swedes, around one-fifth of the population, especially to the United States. This massive exodus of people who were typically young and participating in the labour force, boosted wages as well as the bargaining position of workers more generally.\textsuperscript{49} That inequality grew despite the equalizing effect of induced labour scarcity gives an indicator of how entrenched inequality was during this period. Furthermore, the massive \textsuperscript{47} Svante Nycander, \textit{Makten över arbetsmarknaden: Ett perspektiv på Sveriges 1900-tal} (Stockholm, 2008), uses a Swedish–US comparison to make the argument that the Swedish state early on was friendly to the labour movement. However, in comparison with the USA, as Robin Archer, \textit{Why Is There No Labor Party in the United States?} (Princeton, 2008), makes clear, any west European state would seem labour-friendly c.1900.

emigration was seen by policy makers as a large problem, and became an impetus for social reforms: to convince Swedes to stay in their country, life would have to be better. In Sweden, the emigration problem was a central part of the ‘social question’.

V

The exceptional equality of Swedish economy and society c.1920–90 did not arrive as the logical conclusion of a long historical continuity; with deference to Berggren and Trägårdh, equality is not the ‘fate’ of the Swedes. The logical question is then: what caused the twentieth-century equality? Economic inequality was only reduced after 1920 (compare Figures 1 and 2). Two mechanisms are highlighted in the empirical literature: redistributive taxation, and the fall in capital incomes. The fall in capital incomes after 1920 is related to an increase in regulation after the First World War, as stressed by Piketty, as well as the strengthening of unions after 1920. The emergence of redistributive taxation and the establishment of the welfare state depended, as emphasized by the power resources school, upon the unique strength of the Swedish labour movement.

We must then understand why the unions and the labour movement more generally were so strong in Sweden. Madeleine Hurd’s comparison of German and Swedish political–economic development c.1870–1930 provides an important part of the puzzle. Against the customary interpretation of Germany as traditionally authoritarian and Sweden as structurally democratic and egalitarian, she points out that suffrage was more limited in Sweden than in Prussia before the First World War (see Table 1). Paradoxically but importantly, the very lack of democracy in Sweden would through its effect on social coalitions foster a thorough democratization. The exclusion of such a large part of the population from formal national politics meant that the petty bourgeoisie, lower middle class and working class united in a suffrage reform movement, while in Germany, the greater inclusion of lower middle class men in formal politics meant that middle-class liberals and haute bourgeoisie market liberals could unite around a program of economic liberalism without democracy, against the working class.\footnote{In historical institutionalist parlance, this could be called a sequencing argument. Compare Kathleen Thelen, ‘Historical Institutionalism in Comparative Politics’, \textit{Annual Review of Political Science}, 2 (1999), 389.} The broad ‘small-folk’ (småfolk) alliance in Sweden put the country on a democratic and egalitarian rather than an authoritarian route. Hurd points to the socialist–liberal alliance in Stockholm in the 1890s and early 1900s as being much stronger than in Germany and shows that there was some cultural convergence among labour leaders, to a petty-bourgeois pattern. They were schooled in the small-folk alliance to speak (and write) more formally, to dress in a more middle-class fashion, and so on. This approach to bourgeois culture might have lost the worker ‘some cultural freedom, but it gained him social power’, as political participation in the elitist system at the time was seen as more legitimate if a person’s behaviour was bourgeois.\footnote{Madeleine Hurd, \textit{Public Spheres, Public Mores, and Democracy: Hamburg and Stockholm, 1870–1914} (Ann Arbor, 2000). Small-folk alliance: 270. Socialist–Liberal alliance: 235.}

Hurd’s powerful investigation sheds important light on Sweden in several respects. A common view is that Lib–Labism and liberal influence over workers was particularly strong in Britain, which industrialized before socialism had taken root in the country, and thus had a strong liberal current in its working class, with many workers voting for the liberals until the party-system realignment in the 1920s. This has been seen by observers such as Perry Anderson as a cause of a weaker socialist labour movement in Britain than in the later industrialized Germany. However, in the light of Hurd’s investigation, we might want to modify this conclusion. In Swedish civil society under the politically very exclusive oligarchy that reigned, liberal reformers and social democrats consorted in a manner more akin to Britain than to Germany.\textsuperscript{56} Rather than diluting the effectiveness of the social democratic labour movement, it seems to have placed it in a strong position to reform society, as we will see.

\textit{The popular movements, c. 1870–1914}

Around 1900, one-third of Swedes were members of the unions, the teetotalling movement and/or the free churches.\textsuperscript{57} While the political relevance of teetotalling and free churches might not be very clear,\textsuperscript{58} under the very exclusive and political system in Sweden, the teetotallers and even the free churches provided an organizational infrastructure that strengthened the nascent labour movement. When the labour movement needed organization skills and meeting places, they could co-operate with the two popular movements that were already present. The teetotalling movement that spread in the mid-nineteenth century attracted members especially from society’s lower strata and not least among women. Their members were to a very large extent excluded from official politics, and general suffrage thus became a central demand of the movement, not least with the aim to pursue the issue of prohibition in parliament.\textsuperscript{59} Furthermore, the movement worked as a ‘citizen school’ for lower-class people who learnt political organizing and activism in this context. Cross-organizing with the labour movement became common; in the 1910s, 84 per cent of Social Castles (ed.), \textit{The Comparative History of Public Policy} (Cambridge, 1989), 198. As Rueschemeyer, Huber Stephens and Stephens, \textit{Capitalist Development}, 94, point out, the free churches’ opposition to the State Church in Sweden and the Church of England played very similar roles in Swedish and English society. It would also be interesting to compare Swedish and Dutch popular mobilization; Therborn provides a sketch of such a comparison.

Democratic MPs were teetotallers, and in 1917, all of the new Left Socialist party’s MPs were.\textsuperscript{60} As Rueschemeyer \textit{et al.} argued, ‘it is the growth of a counter-hegemony of subordinate classes and especially the working class — developed and sustained by the organization and growth of trade unions, working-class parties and similar groups — that is critical for the promotion of democracy’. They pointed to Scandinavia as an example of a class organization, and creation of a counter-hegemony that can ‘change the balance of class power in society’.\textsuperscript{61} The popular movements could mobilize large sections of Swedish society. In 1909, the temperance movement collected 1.9 million signatures for prohibition,\textsuperscript{62} which is quite impressive in a country with 5.5 million inhabitants. While the suffrage movement was small in terms of members, at times it could mobilize greatly. So in 1893 for the ‘people’s parliament’ (the alternative, unofficial parliament organized by the movement), 149,856 persons voted for the different Liberal and Social Democratic candidates. This meant that the unofficial parliament had 50 per cent more voters than the actual parliament in the elections to the second chamber that year. Further, the suffrage movement’s petition for general suffrage in 1897 attracted 363,638 signatures, of which only 65,879 had the right to vote to parliament.\textsuperscript{63} While official parliamentary politics in this period was stale and conservative and voter turnout was low (see section IV), the extra-parliamentary popular movements were dynamic and growing.

German social democracy after the lifting of the anti-socialist laws in 1890 is the model of a strong, counter-hegemonic labour movement. In his study of the German labour movement subculture, Lidtke described ‘an environment of clubs, activities, and relationships permeated with socialist political assumptions and implications, and this applied even to labor movement associations that officially denied all political purpose’.\textsuperscript{64} The development of such a counter-hegemonic subculture in Sweden was different, in the intermingling of middle class and working class, liberals and socialists, in the popular movements, but eventually an even stronger labour movement subculture emerged. Swedish working-class associational culture might have been less distinctively proletarian and less beer-soaked than the German version, but it was very strong in the numbers it mobilized and the working-class consciousness that it bred.\(^{65}\) When Hurd dismisses working-class associational culture in Sweden as ‘weak’, this is in my view because she treats the German case too much as a role model.\(^{66}\) When studying the Swedish working-class subculture on its own terms, it becomes more impressive.

The strength of the labour movement

Table 2 shows some key indicators of labour movement organization and working-class cohesion. Unlike the inequality figures in Figure 1 and the suffrage statistics in Table 1, this is a field where Sweden at the end of the ancien régime actually stands out.

The Swedish Social Democrats, formed in 1889 and shaped early on ideologically by the German Marxist tradition, were a very strong electoral force already before the First World War. With 36 per cent of the votes in 1911, even with restricted suffrage, the party had the highest vote share among the nine countries in Table 2. The Swedish party along with its Nordic colleagues was also the strongest in terms of party membership as a share of the population. The German SPD is famous as a mass party but with its nineteen party members per 1,000 inhabitants in 1910, it was outdistanced by the Swedish SAP with its twenty-six members per 1,000 inhabitants. Likewise, union organization was extensive, even though the Swedish figure in Table 2 is depressed by the loss in the general strike of 1909. From the low point of 13 per cent in 1910, union density among workers increased to 31 per cent in 1920; before the loss in the general strike, it had been 26 per cent in 1908.\(^{67}\) A more exotic metric but very important to the argument, is the sales of working-class newspapers per capita. In Denmark, Norway and Sweden for every five to nine male workers, one labour newspaper was sold. This means that Scandinavians, to a much higher degree than other Europeans, got their news from labour movement intellectuals. Party newspapers played an important role in the working-class subculture and movement. They tended to be distributed in cafés, clubs and bars, and thus reached a greater readership than that implied by the subscriber statistics, they provided a career ladder for movement cadres, and a vehicle for the party leadership to disseminate their policies. The strength of the labour press is indicative of something much larger, which is the strength of the working-class subculture in Scandinavia. Historical research on this topic has to some degree focused on more purely cultural expressions such as drinking, or on the degree of rowdiness versus orderliness among workers. My point is something different. The Swedish working class at the beginning of the twentieth century was poor and disenfranchised and lived and worked in a deeply unequal economy, but they were exceptionally organized.

The labour movement counter-hegemony
The traditional measure of labour movement strength (not the least in the power resources tradition) is electoral success and the degree of organization in trade unions. But as Jenny Jansson points out, organization numbers are not everything. The cohesiveness of the organization is almost equally important: to achieve something, the party or the union needs to be able to 68 John D. Stephens, ‘Class Formation and Class Consciousness: A Theoretical and Empirical Analysis with Reference to Britain and Sweden’, British Journal of Sociology, 30 (1979), 407–8, compares the frequency of reading labour movement-sympathizing newspapers in the British and the Swedish working class in the 1970s, and finds that Swedes indeed were much more likely to read a socialist-friendly newspaper. This led according to Stephens to stronger class consciousness in Sweden.

agree on goals. Jansson, who studies the activities of the Workers’ Educational Association, stresses the importance of workers’ education for the creation of a cohesive reformist working-class consciousness in Sweden after the Russian Revolution and until the late 1930s.71

My argument here is related, but more general. The breadth and depth of working-class organization in Sweden in 1910 (or in 1950, for that matter) was unparalleled. The trade unions as stressed by Korpi were important, the Social Democratic party’s successful alliance with the Farmers’ league as highlighted by Esping-Andersen was important, and the workers’ education as emphasized by Jansson was important.72 But the cumulative effect of it all was important in a way that I believe has not been argued in the previous literature. The total outcome of the exceptional organizational strength of the Swedish labour movement was a working class with an exceptional degree of organization as well as ideological cohesion.

Class consciousness
There are no survey studies of class consciousness in the first half of the twentieth century; the Swedish National Election Survey started in 1954. However, Särlvik pointed out that the social bases of Swedish parties were stable from the 1920s to the 1950s. The party landscape was organized in two blocs: on the left, the giant Social Democratic party and the small Communist party, and at centre-right, the Farmers’ league, the Liberals and the Conservatives. While voters of the three centre-right parties had quite weak party affiliations and flowed between the three parties without too much afterthought, this was not the case on the left. The Social Democrats in the 1950s and 1960s had a remarkably high share of voters who were ‘convinced adherents’ of the party.73 In 1968, when the Social Democrats won a parliamentary majority, 51 per cent of their voters ‘strongly identified’ with the party, and another 25 per cent ‘weakly identified’; 18 per cent said that they only had a preference for the party, without identification. Older voters were especially likely to strongly identify with the party.74 Furthermore, in terms of party members’ share of the electorate, Sweden, with 23–24 per cent from the 1950s (when the statistics begin) to the 1980s, along with Austria was the most highly organized country, due to the Social Democrats and the farmers.75

The earliest survey of class consciousness in Sweden was made in the industrial city of Katrineholm in 1948. Then, 80 per cent of manual workers and 50 per cent of white-collar workers considered themselves to be working class. Furthermore, a majority of the inhabitants, when asked which class was in power in Swedish society, replied the working class. When the study was replicated in post-industrial Katrineholm in the 1980s, the results were different: fewer identified as working class, and they did not believe that the working class was in power. The analysts concluded that: ‘The identification with a movement in the process of conquering power has been replaced with the feeling of having left power to an elite’.76 In his study of German workers’ autobiographies, Günther Roth claims that vulgar Marxism had a special appeal among rather passive grass-roots members of the movement who could profess belief in the power of social democracy and its leaders, with no special need for their own activism.77 In the Swedish context, the party leader of the 1930s and 1940s Per Albin Hansson had a similar view. Hansson studied the social groups tables produced by Statistics Sweden, which showed the rapid growth of social group III, roughly the working class and the strongest basis of social democratic support, with a firm belief that this growth of the lower classes itself guaranteed a future Social Democratic majority. A view that may seem irrational now but that made more sense in the 1930s and 1940s, when the support for and belief in social democracy was firmly entrenched in the everyday life of the Swedish working class.

The immense organizational drive that marked Sweden from the 1870s to the 1920s changed the political ecology of the country durably. When at the turn of the millennium the political sociologist Rydgren wanted to explain why Sweden still had no successful extreme right party, he invoked the factor ‘enduring class loyalties’. While the working class often can be recruited to extreme right parties — as has to some degree happened in Sweden since Rydgren wrote his article — in 2002, the high degree of class voting and union membership could still be singled out as an obstacle to far-right expansion within the working class. Around 1990, as the public power investigation noted, the belief that the working class was the majority of the country and ruled the country had eroded. But in hindsight, what is remarkable is not that the working-class counter-hegemony decayed in the 1980s and 1990s, but that it lasted so long.

The role of ideology

In some analyses, ideological flexibility is seen as a key determinant of the success of the Swedish Social Democrats. Berman argues that compared to the German SPD, which was hampered by dogmatic adherence to Marxism when facing the economic crises of the 1920s and 1930s, the SAP was more flexible and pursued a constructive policy. This is a relevant point, but that the SAP pursued an expansionist jobs policy in the 1930s may equally well be related to the similar policy pursued in working-class-dominated municipalities already in the 1920s, where the policy was arrived at because of the material interest of the unemployed party and trade union 79 Jens Rydgren, ‘Radical Right Populism in Sweden: Still a Failure, But for How Long?’, Scandinavian Political Studies, 25 (2002). When Rydgren in 2018 revisited the 2002 article, he argued that it was precisely the declining class consciousness and adherence to social democracy of the working class, and the decreasing left–right divide on economic and social policy, which opened up for the radical right in the years since 2002. members, rather than from a reading of economic theory. Furthermore, empirical studies of the SAP’s policy making have shown a great deal of improvisation and shifting ideological motivation. Generally, the ideological complexion of the SAP was not that different from other European Social Democratic parties, with a combination of Kautskyan Marxism, English guild socialism, liberal reformism, German Kathedersozialismus, and Bernsteinian revisionism. It was not any originality in the field of the ideas that allowed the SAP to come further than other Social Democratic parties, but its solid popularity in the lower classes, which allowed the SAP to enjoy many years in government (most notably, continuously from 1932 to 1976), and to improvise egalitarian policies based on the shifting realities of twentieth-century Sweden, as well as ideological trends.

The road to the alliance between farmers and workers
In political economy analyses such as those of Korpi, Esping-Andersen and Luebbert, the alliance between the Social Democrats and the Farmers’ league in the 1930s is seen as key to the rise of social democratic hegemony. In relation to the possible continuity from farmers to workers in the Swedish Sonderweg thesis, it is worth revisiting the famous ‘cow trade’ of 1932 that started the 44-year period of uninterrupted Social Democratic government.

83 Korpi, Democratic Class Struggle; Esping-Andersen, Politics against Markets; Luebbert, Liberalism, Fascism, or Social Democracy.

84 It may be seen as a pre-condition of the alliance that the reformist labour movement, that is, the Social Democrats, were dominant versus the Communist party, which indeed they were. The CP (explicitly communist from 1921 to 1990) never got more than 10.3 per cent of the votes, obtained in 1944 as the Soviet military victories against Nazi Germany gave communism increased prestige. The root cause for the lack of grounding for Swedish communism is the early dominance of the Social Democrats due to the organizational strength established as discussed above. This did not leave much room to the left on the political arena. The Social Democrats were a big

The 1920s, the first decade with universal suffrage, was chaotic in matters of government. During the decade, Sweden had ten different governments (Liberals, Social Democrats, Conservatives as well as apolitical bureaucrats). By the late 1920s, it was clear that a greater degree of political stability was desirable. The Social Democrats, it seemed, would need a coalition partner to last longer than the six to twenty months of their three governments during the 1920s. Party leader Per Albin Hansson observed that in Denmark, the Social Democrats governed from 1929 with the small radical liberal party Radikale Venstre. In 1932, the SAP performed very well in the election, increasing from 90 to 104 mandates in the second chamber, with the Conservatives decreasing from 73 to 58, the Liberals also shrinking (from 28 to 20), while the Farmers’ league grew from 27 to 36. When Hansson and the SAP leadership surveyed possible coalition partners, they could observe that the Danish colleagues by now had shifted to an alliance with the farmer-dominated liberal Venstre party. The SAP leadership worried about the possible attractions to fascism within the Farmers’ league, however. The Social Democratic finance minister Sköld and his wife were given the task of inviting top farmer politicians for dinner at the Skölds’ house, to discreetly gather information on their possible fascist sympathies. What they found was that while the farmers were tent with a lively left within the party, and at the same time the party vigorously fought the communists (within the trade unions, renters’ organization and on other fronts), both with clean and dirty methods. Hermansson: En politisk biografi (Stockholm 2005).

85 It should be noted that the Farmers’ league (Bondeförbundet) was formed in 1914; the previous Country party (Lantmannapartiet) was dissolved in 1904 when it coalesced with other conservative forces into the Conservative party (Allmänna Valmansförbundet).
very pro-eugenics, they did not sympathize with Nazism. The SAP could then negotiate with the farmers as well as the Conservatives and the Liberals about the formation of a coalition government. The Conservatives and the Liberals declined, and the SAP ended up with a complete, and within the party rather controversial, surrender to the farmers on agricultural policy, to get a functioning coalition.\textsuperscript{86} After steep declines in the prices of agricultural products in connection with the Great Depression, the Farmers’ league was ideologically flexible and pragmatic: for very generous state price guarantees to the farmers, they were willing to collaborate with Social Democrats.\textsuperscript{87} Furthermore, a faction of one of the two Liberal parties also voted for the new economic policy, giving some support to the Social Democratic leadership’s original hunch that a Lib–Lab coalition might be the way forward.\textsuperscript{88}

Previous research by Korpi, Esping-Andersen, Luebbert and others is completely right in emphasizing the 1932 coalition between the Farmers’ party and the Social Democrats as a massively important factor for the unique influence of the Social Democrats in Sweden. But it is imperative not to interpret this coalition as a logical or unavoidable outcome of a long continuity of friendly farmer–worker relations. On the contrary, in 1914 when 30,000 farmers marched the streets of Stockholm in support of the king’s power and against parliamentary democracy, the labour movement countered with a 100,000-strong march the next day, with the opposite message.\textsuperscript{89} There was no long tradition of farmer–worker alliances in Sweden and the Farmers’ party was not the first-choice coalition partner for the SAP in 1932–33; the Liberals were.

The takeover of the state

When the Social Democrats were in government after 1932, they knew that the bureaucracy was staffed by people who did not sympathize with their policy aims. They understood, stressed Rothstein in his book on the ‘social democratic state’, that they had to people the bureaucracy with new cadres, sympathetic to the new policies, to be able to implement them effectively. 90 Rothstein compared the success of Social Democrats in steering actual policy in two fields: labour market policy and education policy, and showed that the labour market board was full of Social Democratic cadres and steered with social democratic goals in mind, while the schooling board was less committed to equality. Rothstein claimed that this difference led to a more successful — from a social democratic point of view — policy on the labour market policy area.

An important precondition of why the Social Democrats could refocus the bureaucracy was the strong educational wing of the labour movement. Another probable cause of this successful cadre bureaucracy project was that Sweden even in its reactionary guise in the late nineteenth century had relatively high levels of literacy and numeracy. This is one field where we can indeed hint at a historical Swedish Sonderweg: considering how backward the economy was in 1800 or 1750, literacy was remarkably widespread. 91 The legacy of popular education probably facilitated the growth of popular movements and their competence after 1870, and thus indirectly influenced the egalitarian turn of Sweden in the twentieth century. Furthermore, the relative closeness between intellectual liberals and the labour movement in the early twentieth century, under the very exclusive political regime that was then in place, probably gave a lasting legacy of easier recruitment of left-liberal intellectuals to steer the social democratic state. The strength of the Social Democratic cadres meant that they could build an advanced welfare state with ambitious redistributive aims. Thus, together with the exceptional strength of the trade unions, the foundations for a new equality were put in place.

after the 1920s. Along with literacy levels high for the level of economic development of the country, another historical legacy in Sweden was that of an efficient state. That the Swedish state was relatively competent and powerful internally already in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was argued by Tilly, and has found support in later historical research. In Heclo’s state-centred account, this is key to the growth of the ambitious Swedish welfare state in the twentieth century. However, as Premfors points out, the competent bureaucrats of the old regime did not want democratization — on the contrary, this was forced on them. Nevertheless, the competence of the state facilitated ambitious social democratic policies as well, once democracy was in place in 1921.

CONCLUDING REFLECTIONS

In Swedish history, there was no simple continuity from a peasant-farmer egalitarianism to a social democratic one. On the contrary, from c.1920 to 1980, Sweden experienced a rapid transition, which built on the popular mobilization of the previous decades. This contradicts the Swedish Sonderweg thesis in all its versions — the peasant-focused Moorian approach, the cultural version, and the political culture version. The roots of modern Swedish egalitarianism were in the huge organizational drive of the ‘popular movements’ in the decades after 1870. This counter-hegemony achieved through union and political activity equalization of votes, incomes and wealth. In this way, the article supports the institutional approach to understanding the determinants of economic inequality. Politics is, as Hacker and Pierson say, organized combat and the Swedish working class was the most well organized in the world; this meant that Sweden became the most social-democratic country in the world.\textsuperscript{95}

Swedish history is more tumultuous and more interesting than conventional accounts would have us believe. The present article has shown several deficiencies in the received wisdom, and thereby demonstrated the need for further research on several of the issues discussed. Four may be discussed very briefly. One is the political role of the teetotallers and the free churches, and the interaction between religion and politics. It seems that while both these movements played an important role in Swedish democratization, especially the free churches’ political energy was quickly exhausted; they set a new politics in motion, but as a result also faded from political prominence.\textsuperscript{96} There is also a lack of investigation into the role of the Church of Sweden in the old regime. Despite the fact that the conservative, Christian philosopher Sigurd Ribbing and bishop Gottfrid Billing were two of the most important conservative ideologues in Sweden around the turn of the century, and that the Church had a very strong tradition of political representation going back to the pre-1866 estates diet, no comprehensive investigation has been made of the Church’s political role c.1870–1920, and therefore we also lack an analysis of the relationship between the free churches, associated with liberalism, and the Church of Sweden, associated with the conservatives.\textsuperscript{97} It would be interesting to draw comparisons, for example, with Britain, where the conservatives successfully used the banner of the united Church to mobilize against the left, and the free churches seemingly played a role similar to that in Sweden, and in the \textsuperscript{96} Lundkvist, \textit{Politik, nykerhet, och reformer}, 373. In 1964 a Christian Democratic party was founded with a strong basis in the free churches, but the role of this party is very different to the political aspects of free churches discussed here.

Netherlands, which also had politically important free churches. An investigation of the socio-political dynamic between the free churches and the state church would also open up for investigation the ideological and mentalities aspects of this church split. While historians have investigated whether the free churches encouraged more ‘modern’ demographic behaviour, reflecting a new mentality, and were harbingers of secularization, the political aspects of the process are less known.

A second issue that calls for more research is the development and shifts of farmer politics. These shifts are under-appreciated in the current literature, which typically has studied one short period at a time. What stands out when one surveys the literature are the discontinuities: from the oppositional politics of the late estates diet to the conservatism of the Country party, then the ten years without an agrarian party, then a Farmers’ league oscillating between the far right and the alliance with Social Democrats. This fractured development deserves a comprehensive treatment, to explain the shifting roles of the farmers in a varying socio-political context.

The third issue to highlight is the reformist alliance between the liberal intelligentsia and the labour movement. In the final two decades of the nineteenth century an influential liberal reformist intelligentsia came forward, as has recently been highlighted in a string of powerful studies. This literature has clearly shown the limitations in perspectives on the evolution of the Swedish

On the late nineteenth century: Thermaenius, Lantmannapartiet och Carlsson, Lantmannapartiet och industrialsmen. The research literature on the Farmers’ league in the 1910s is strikingly weak; Yngve Mohlin, Bondepartiet och det moderna samhället 1914–1936 (Umeå, 1989) is a mechanically quantitative investigation of electoral support that yields very little understanding of the new party’s character and role in Swedish society at the time. The literature on the party and the farmers’ organizations more generally during the Great Depression is richer: Rydén, Att äka snälskjuts and Per Thullberg, Bönder går samman (Stockholm, 1977) are two interesting studies.

welfare state that focus only on social democracy. However, without the reformist impetus of the labour movement, the philanthropic efforts of the liberal intelligentsia would have been limited to social liberal islands in an otherwise conservative sea. Therefore, the interaction between the liberals and the labour movement, and the shifting initiatives in reformism, seem to offer fruitful avenues for further research.102

The fourth issue is the political dynamics of lagging Swedish democratization. As Swedish historians have stated, the 1865–66 representation reform was ‘society-preserving’, but why was it so?103 Why did it become a road block against further reform, allowing Sweden to become one of the least democratic countries in western Europe, rather than a stepping stone for reformism? Here a promising route forward would be a comparison with the three other Nordic countries, with their quite different roads to democracy.104 Beyond the historical account put forward here, there is another reason to doubt the Swedish Sonderweg thesis. If equality is a long-lasting national trait, built into a deep-seated political culture, perhaps even the ‘fate’ of the Swedish people,105 then the degree of economic equality should be rather stable over time. The equality that marked the distribution of Swedish incomes and wealth in the third quarter of the twentieth century should not, contrary to the argument put forward in this article, be threatened just because the Social Democrats and the labour movement more generally have been weakened since the 1980s. In fact, however, the Gini coefficient of Swedish incomes has increased from 21.2 in 1975 and 19.8 in 1981, the lowest point, to 28.1 in 2014, the latest available year. Sweden is now the eleventh most equal OECD country, beaten by all the Nordic countries, but also, for example, Slovenia, Belgium and Austria.106 Likewise, the share of total income accruing to the 10 per cent with the highest incomes has grown from 22 per cent in 102 Of course, this argument is influenced by Hurd, Public Spheres. Christer Skoglund, Vita mössor under röda fanor: Vänsterstudenter, kulturradikalism och bikldningsideal i Sverige 1880–1940 (Stockholm, 1991) provides an interesting study of the leftward drift of students and academics from the 1880s to the 1940s.

the early 1980s to 28 per cent in 2015 according to the World Inequality Database (WID). The redistributive ambitions of the welfare state have diminished so much that social policy scholars question whether Sweden is still a ‘social democratic model’. The Swedish welfare state thus moves ever closer to the allegedly Anglo-Saxon liberal model. Economic and political equality in twentieth-century Sweden was not an eternal, unmoveable national trait, but a socio-political construction. As such, it may also be abolished by political means.
